1. A Garden Worth Testing

A small garden could make the school grounds more welcoming and give pupils a useful place to observe plants. It might also provide shade in the future. However, the council should consider watering costs and the space needed for assemblies.

A trial with movable pots would allow the school to explore the idea without making a permanent change immediately. Members should first record how the concrete area is used and listen to pupils with different needs. After the trial, they could compare costs, access and pupils' experiences. The best decision would come from evidence and practical discussion rather than from choosing the most confident speaker.

2. The council could offer an anonymous paper form as well as a discussion. This would allow pupils who dislike speaking in a large group to explain their concerns and suggest alternatives without feeling pressured.

1. Shade or plant observation; wet-weather queuing.

The answer must match the stated details; accept equivalent accurate wording.

2. The garden may offer benefits, but the committee should consult the people who use the space.

Check the complete meaning, the verb and punctuation. Accept an equally accurate correction.

3. The trial is a useful first step. The committee should check whether the remaining paved space is wide enough for wet-weather queues and whether pupils can reach the plants easily. Supporters and current users can both identify practical needs. Their feedback may help the school design a garden without removing another useful function.
