Open tasks: models show one possible response. Accept other accurate, relevant answers.

Page 1: Explain your language choices

1. I selected practical details that would help adult residents decide whether and how to attend. I retained the requirement to register and the limit on electrical work because removing either could create misleading expectations. I did not invent an event date or claim that accessible toilets had been confirmed.
The opening heading combines an action with a benefit, presenting the event as a learning opportunity rather than a guaranteed repair service. Direct address makes the information relevant to individual visitors, while modal verbs and qualifications such as "may" and "cannot be guaranteed" keep the promises realistic.
I separated costs from entry arrangements because "free" could otherwise be misunderstood. The short sentence about agreeing replacement-part costs makes that distinction explicit. I also placed access information before the final call to contact the centre so that readers can ask informed questions.
My register is friendly but precise. Rather than reproducing survey numbers as a claim about the whole community, I identified the small respondent group. This supports an accurate and responsible public voice.

2. Check that the underlined detail matches a source and that the circled choice is explained accurately. There is no single correct selection.

1. It adds a greeting and supportive we/us language; it replaces an abstract location with the concrete blue desk, making the message more welcoming and easier to follow.
The answer must match the stated details; accept equivalent accurate wording.
2. The greeting creates a welcome, while the concrete phrase blue desk gives readers a clearer meeting point.
Check the complete meaning, the verb and punctuation. Accept an equally accurate correction.
3. Message: Welcome to the library team. Please meet us at the blue desk so we can show you where to begin.
Commentary: Welcome directly acknowledges newcomers. The concrete phrase blue desk makes the meeting point easier to identify, while we can show you offers practical support.
